insight2050 in the Community

Dublin's Bridge Street District will provide choices for retail, services and riverfront parks within walking distance of new homes and offices, turning the Scioto River corridor into an accessible destination for Dublin residents and visitors.

"When we carefully mix uses that create vibrant, walkable environments, numerous public and private benefits will follow, including the enhanced economic competitiveness of our communities. Younger adults and empty nesters both seem to have an increasing desire for these types of residential environments." –Terry Foegler, Director of Strategic Initiatives/Special Projects, Dublin, Ohio

Central Ohio Transit Authority (COTA) is coordinating a long-range planning effort with the findings of insight2050. NextGen will consider how our growing population and changing preferences and priorities will shape opportunities and demand for public transportation.

"COTA NextGen envisions a way forward. Using the data and direction provided by insight2050 COTA has started prioritizing investments so we can ensure that the COTA of the future connects people and places in ways that continue to meet their needs, and support and drive economic development." –Curtis Stitt, President & CEO, Central Ohio Transit Authority

Grove City has embraced insight2050 in its community visioning with the launch of Grove City 2050, a planning process that will consider growth and development over the next several decades with an eye toward public and environmental health.

"35 years ago, our commitment to long-range planning and investments in infrastructure were instrumental to making our city one of the largest and fastest-growing communities in Central Ohio. Now, our collaborative efforts with insight2050 will lead us to an even brighter future. Grove City2050 addresses zoning and innovative land planning practices that will make Grove City an even better place to live, work, and raise a family." –Richard L. "Ike" Stage, Mayor, Grove City, Ohio
